What Is A Grid Poem?

One day I was sitting a lounge I frequent readings through several books about the history of the sonnet. I was preparing for a presentation I was giving and wanted to brush up on my knowledge of international sonneteers. While reading I came across a description of one poetry book that blew my mind. It's called Cent mille milliards de poèmes, a book by Raymond Queneau, a French Poet.

The title translates to "One Hundred Million Million Poems." The funny thing is, the book only contains 10 sonnets. Yet each sonnet is written in a specific way--each line is on a card you can punch out and rearrange the order. The lines all have the same rhyme scheme and the same sounds, and can be rearranged into different combinations numbering  $10^{14}$ .

All that from 10 sonnets. I was dumbfounded, and also inspired. It got me thinking of various other poetic exercises and forms I had seen over the years, and how in certain workshops I have led, the advice I have given many poets countless times was "simply switch the order of the lines" and we would all be amazed how much improved the poem would be, with the same words, in different order.

So on a spur of the moment impulsive challenge to myself, I put down the book I was reading, turned to one of my writing notebooks and decided to see if I could write a poem to be read across and down. I found this hard to do without putting extra separation on the words, so I drew myself a little grid. It was 5 by 5. This is how the Grid Poem as you are going to read about in this text, came to be.

On the next page you are going to see an example of the "Grid Poem" in its grid form that I wrote.

Read Across, Then Down

The	Reflection	Of	The	Water(')s
Images	Brings	An	Immersion	That
Present(s)	An	Eerie	Sight	Beheld
Memory's	Eternal	Mirror	Shows	History
Ghosts	Chase	Shadow(')s	Past	Lessons

You might notice a few things when looking at this Grid. First and foremost, how much can be gotten from a mere 25 words.

You might also notice the parenthesis that allow for double-use possessives, and that there can be frequent enjambments.

Now take a look at the poems in actual poetic form, without the grid.

Across:

The reflection of the water
Images bring an immersion that Presents The reflection of the water
Memory's eternal mirror shows history
Ghosts chase shadow's past lessons

Down:

The images present memory's ghosts
Reflection brings an eternal chase
Of an eerie mirror shadow
The immersion sight shows past
Water that beheld history lessons.

So here you see that from this simple 25 word grid, we have gotten arguably two complete poems. One can play around with the possessives and the punctuation as they want to, but the essence is, the same words, presented differently, bring about entirely different poems. And while this concept is generally obvious, the grid really helps to bring it into focus and get the creative energies flowing.

How To Write A Grid Poem

Writing a Grid Poem can be a little tricky at first but the basic structure is easy enough to learn. As you probably guessed from the example previous, it starts with mapping out a grid, either in a notebook by hand, or in your word processor.

For my purposes and what I've personally found best to work with myself is the 5 by 5 grid to create a poem of 25 words.

Of course, a 5 by 5 grid isn't the only size grid you can do.

One could give a shot at a 3 x 3 grid if the idea of a 5 x 5 is too much. Think of it as a grid haiku (haikai.)

I	Am	Lost(,)
Am	Deciding	I'm
Sure	What	Spent

Across:

I Am Lost
 Am Deciding I'm Sure What Spent

Down:

I Am Sure
 Am Deciding What
 Lost, I'm Spent

With fewer words there are fewer options, and so punctuation might become more important as you can see with the comma that works one way (but not the other.)

But as you can see, there are possibilities with a 3 x 3 poem.

Of course, smaller is not the only way one can go, if one is brave enough they can try for a larger grid.

Want to try that grid? Good luck. I don't really want to try it myself! But I'm sure there are some poets out there who would like the challenge.

So let's assume one is going to start and try with the standard 5 x 5 grid. How does one get started?

First draw yourself the grid:

Once you have the grid set up, it helps to decide on a few words you want to make sure go in the poem. If you are working with a writing group or doing a challenge, you can decide the word bank together. If you are doing it solo, you can decide the words to be anchors of the poem.

- Divine
- Destiny
- Sacrifice
- Patience
- Enlightened

So let's say these 5 words were the word bank? For a 25 word poem or 5 x 5 about 5 words is what you want to start. Then plug them into the grid to start.

	Divine
Destiny
				Patience
Enlightened		Sacrifice

The	Divine	Offer	A	Page
Destiny	Speaks	By	Voice	Illuminated
Of	Purpose	God	Commands	Patience
Faith	Accepts(,)	Delays(,)	Praying(,)	Paused(,)
Enlightened	Follow(s)	Sacrifice(,)	Penitence	Waiting.

And as you can see once they are plugged in, you can add the rest of the words to complete the poem.

- You can have alternative possessives and enjambments
- Try to use words in their base form as much as possible
- You CAN use the same word twice in cases of conjunctions but try to limit this.
- Pick certain words you want to include and be flexible with the rest.
- Reorganizing the position of words in the grid is probable. It might take a few times to get it.

A "Grid Poem" doesn't necessarily need to produce complete poems on its own as much as be a worthy exercise to give ideas. You can find while looking through the words in the grid many different lines that could be transposed into other poems you are writing, or perhaps function as prompts for poems.

The	Reflection	Of	The	Water(')s
Images	Brings	An	Immersion	That
Present(s)	An	Eerie	Sight	Beheld
Memory's	Eternal	Mirror	Shows	History
Ghosts	Chase	Shadow(')s	Past	Lessons

Take a look at the words that stick out here in bold:

The Reflection Of An Eerie Mirror

Sounds like a good verse to put in a poem, no?

How about the underlined words?

Ghosts Chase Eternal Shadows

And the italicized words?

The Immersion Beheld History Lessons

Any one of these lines could be a verse in another poem. They could be the first lines of entire other poems, or the finishing line of other poems. But as you look at the grid, different patterns of the words, in different orders will stick out and give ideas and inspiration.

So even if your attempt at a grid poem doesn't produce a complete poem across and down, there is still plenty of value to be had in the exercise.

Grid Poem Examples

Since introducing the grid poem I've used it as a prompt and exercise in many workshop type settings. Some of the poets who attend have really taken to the form. And so, in this section we'll be taking a look at some of the creative ways a few other poets have used the form.

Jim Landwher

Before	Lies	Spilling	Magic(.)	Nuance(.)
The	Water	Over	Death's	Unwelcome
Entrance	Running	Monochrome	Image(s)	Morphing
To	Melancholy	Filled	Enchanted	Ghosts
Happiness	And	Divine	Beyond	Imagination

Across

Before lies spilling magic nuance
the water over death's unwelcome entrance running monochrome images,
morphing to melancholy filled enchanted ghosts.
Happiness and divine beyond imagination

Down

Before the entrance to happiness lies water running melancholy and spilling over monochrome filled divine magic.
Death's images enchanted beyond nuance.
Unwelcome morphing ghosts imagination

Jim Landwher used the grid to a T and as a result got two complete poems across and down. He used a lot of the tools we talked about, such as punctuation or plurals in parenthesis to indicate usage in one direction but not the other. And when reading the poems in their solo form, you can see the usage of that in action.

Mary Langer Thompson

Serendipitous	Highways	Illuminate	Mirage	Lakes(,)
Entrance	As	Portal	Of	Protest
Through	Images(,.)	Miracle(')s	Clarity	Swirling(,)
Worlds	Travel(,.)	Rivers	bend	Lonesome(,.)
Multitudinous(,)	mercies	Calm(,.)	Morning(,.)	Fog.

Across

Serendipitous highways illuminate mirage lakes,
entrance as portal of protest
through images, miracle's clarity swirling
worlds travel. Rivers bend lonesome.
Multitudinous mercies calm morning fog.

Down

Serendipitous entrance through worlds multitudinous, highways as images. Travel mercies illuminate portal miracles, rivers calm.
Mirage of clarity bends morning.
Lakes protest swirling, lonesome fog.

Mary's grid poem makes very good use of punctuation. Take a look in the second column, third row for the word Images.

Images(,) see the double punctuation she has here? It indicates that in the across version of the poem, a comma follows images, whereas in the down version of the poem, a period follows.

This type of double-grammatical usage in the grid set up reminds us that when writing, the words can be the same, but the punctuation, or the inflection, the pause, all these nuances can have a profound effect on the meaning of the words. We all know this inherently, but sometimes it is easy to forget. One of the benefits of the grid exercise is a reminder to remember what we already know.

in frightening screams. Within prisons, between dreams, flowing rapids echo.

Down

Waters pour sparkles in between their laughter, and frightening dreams—mirages through rivers—scream, flowing with echoing floods within rapids—
Music, canyons, boulders, prisons echo.

Katherine Gotthardt, M.Ed.

Candlelight	In	Darkened	Rooms	Reflecting
Shadows	Specters'	Smoke	Disappearing	Beneath
Some	Flickering	Phantasms	Asking	Questions
Without	Answers	ways	of	Extinguishing
Fire	Without	Destroying	Flames	Warmth

Across

Candlelight in darkened rooms reflecting shadows, specters' smoke disappearing beneath some flickering phantasms asking questions without answers, ways of extinguishing fire without destroying flames' warmth.

Down

Candlelight shadows, some without fire, in specters' flickering answers without darkened smoke, phantasms' ways destroying rooms, disappearing, asking of flames reflecting beneath questions, extinguishing warmth.

Modified Line Breaks

Candlelight in darkened rooms,
reflecting shadows,
specters' smoke disappearing
beneath some flickering phantasms
asking questions without answers,
ways of extinguishing fire
without destroying flames' warmth.

Candlelight shadows,
some without fire,
in specters' flickering answers
without darkened smoke,
phantasms' ways destroying rooms,
disappearing, asking of flames reflecting
beneath questions,
extinguishing warmth.

With a Few Words Changed

I remember you
standing in candlelight,
darkened rooms
reflecting shadows,
specters' smoke disappearing
beneath some flickering phantasms
asking questions without answers:
What are the ways of extinguishing fire
without destroying flames' warmth?

Candlelight shadows,
some without fire.
In specters' flickering answers
without darkened smoke,
phantasms' ways are destroying rooms.
Disappearing, the dead begin asking of the flames reflecting
beneath questions:
How can even think
of extinguishing warmth?

Notice the ingenuity in Katherine's use of the grid? Not only does she get the pure across and down poems by using it, but she goes a couple of steps further and modifies the line breaks to give a different look and feel to the poems she made...and then she takes the base of the grid poems and changes a few words to make entirely different poems.

This is perfectly in line with the general spirit of the grid poem in the sense that the across and down is not the only thing you can get out of using it. If you are creative, you can shape and form various poems from the words in your grid, and get inspiration from many different angles.

Peaceful	Folk	Entrance(d)(.)	A	Joyful
Stream(.)	Together(.)	Mount	Rising	Music

Word Bank:

Entrance

Music

Reflection

River

Water

Across:

Reflection ripples along the river's tides
To harmonized tunes sung through calm waters.
Images of peaceful folk entrance a joyful stream.
Together mount rising music.

Down:

Reflective tides through peaceful stream
Ripples to calm folk together.
Along harmonized waters, entranced.
Mount the tunes.
Images, a rising river sung of joyful music.

Notice how in this poem, the poet lists the word bank of the words they plugged into the grid from the get go. Also notice how they chose to use enjambment of the lines and different line breaks in their version of the across and down rather than use the traditional 5 lines. With grid poems, the rules are basically guidelines--as long as creativity comes from it, that is the important part.

Notice how Tanya has Jack-in-the-Box strategically placed in the center box so it is the center word in the poem either way. Popping out in a poetic metaphor to the toy itself. With the poem centered like above, you can see the center word stick out more.

Grid Poem Workbook

Now that you know what a grid poem is, and you've seen several examples of both the traditional and several non-traditional ways to do them, your turn to start writing grid poems! In the following pages, we have grids lined out, for the typical 5 x 5, 25 word grid poem for you to use as a template. In some of them we will provide word banks, in others we will have suggested words plugged in, and others will be entirely blank for you to do what you want with.

Good luck as you venture into the creation of this unique and exciting form, hopefully it will inspire you and you will get some good poems or at least good verse out of it.

As a bonus, get together with some friends or a workshop group and do some grid poems together. A fun exercise if the group is small enough (3-7 people) is to each pick a word to fit somewhere in the grid. Try it out and see how it goes.
